- male sexual violence is 'regular' and 'widespread' in conflict.
 - sexual violence has profound physical, psychological and social consequences for female and male victims/survivors.
 - the end of conflict brings complex and challenging prospects for female and male combatants and those associated with fighting forces.
 - women are at the forefront of conflict prevention, resolution and peacebuilding efforts, yet they are consistently underrepresented or excluded from formal peace negotiations.
 - during and following conflict, men may experience loss of traditional roles leading to a 'crisis of identity'.
 - crises can create opportunities for improving gender relations but also trigger a return to the status quo and a backlash against women and efforts to improve gender relations.

Gender dimensions commonly observed in many natural disasters are:

- women are more likely to die during natural disasters.
- masculine and feminine norms can disadvantage men, women, boys and girls during disasters and their aftermath.
- women and girls have specific health needs and face specific health-related risks during disasters and their aftermath.
- gender inequality in many societies creates gender-specific vulnerabilities during disasters and their aftermath.
- disasters create environments where violence and exploitation can thrive.
- women are often at the forefront of post-disaster community recovery and rehabilitation efforts, which can create opportunities for their advancement and changes in gender relations.

While the gender dimensions of crisis environments point to the necessity of a gender perspective in operations sent to respond to these crises, it is also increasingly accepted and understood that adopting a gender perspective improves the effectiveness of these operations and will pay dividends in both conflict and disaster environments. A gender perspective enables enhanced understanding of the risk and threats to the local population, as well as the vulnerabilities, needs, strengths, capacities, priorities and interests of the local population. The operational benefits are significant. A gender perspective can also assist operations to prioritise their tasks; develop targeted programming; ensure more accurate, effective and equitable service provision; decrease the chance of 'blind spots' (Olsson and Tejpar et al. 2009: 111); reduce the likelihood of unintended harm to beneficiaries (Anderlini 2010: 33; Delaney and Shrader 2000: 10); and reduce potential backlash against the operation (Olsson and Tejpar et al. 2009: 117). Participation and consultation with all segments of a population—women, men, girls and boys—are essential components of adopting a gender perspective in any program.
